

1) I've had a breakthrough over the last few weeks. I feel different. More calm, more an observer. I feel that I've had to learn to accept things and people for who they are. I've learnt that I have to draw boundaries with love and kindness - not with entitlement and

2) The act of creation is very involved and can exhaust you completely. Unfortunately the high that comes from surprising yourself and creating something new with a personality of its own.

3) It is very important to rest before and after creating an artwork.

4) I have learnt that it's best not to judge my work for at least 3 days after creation.

5) Every work of mine has to be an individual with a complex beautiful personality.

6) Are we imitating God's creative power?
~~Isn't~~ Is personality God's distinguishing achievement? At least to us it feels that way.

7) I've learnt that sometimes the simplest things (seemingly totally harmless) set a downward spiral in motion, one micro deviation at a time. From Karthik, I've learnt to trust my gut and pause / take a break / play ~~your~~^{my} own skeptic / or what ever it takes to detach emotion consciously from any outcome.

8) the toughest balancing act seems to be the ability simultaneously to have a larger vision [gives solid ^{resources and} momentum to a project] and re-visit the vision at every step and even completely abandon it at times when necessary. After all - a vision is only to direct ones energies sharper. Every outcome vision should have within it a healthy dose of the critical / deconstruction.] and be willing to discover a better version after each step.

9) I also realised that "integrity" to my work involved compromises to my natural / comfortable way of doing things, the trick, is to create a playground for various compromising options and question truly ones own assumptions ~~and~~ about our knowledge about the outcome.

10) Have the humility to know that you have absolutely no clue about how your work will be received. Just be prepared to stand by it. And also to be willing to change if you learn something new.

there ~~will be~~^{are} times when I look at my work and think - what am I doing fooling myself that this matters. I have to stop and remind myself that I have to remember why I'm doing it and stay true to the experiment. After completing it, I'm okay with analyzing it. ~~I've learnt that the devil is in the detail. No amount of planning can prepare you for~~
